

George Grosz (Berlin 1893 - Berlin 1959)

Schlachtfeld (slagveld), 1915

Litho

290 x 200 mm

Gesigneed en gedateerd in potlood rechtsonder

Waarschijnlijk 10 exemplaren en minimaal 2 proefdrukken en 2 zonder nummering

Exhibitions

Namen, Musée Félicien Rops, 14-18 La guerre vue par Otto Dix/ George Grosz/Dirk Braeckman, 2013

Besançon, Musée du Temps, Impressions du Front II. George Grosz / Otto Dix, 2014

Mechelen, Kazerne Dossin, The Art of War, 2017

Literature:

Alexander Dückers, George Grosz. Das druckgraphische Werk, Berlin, 1979, nr E 24 p.132 and p.25 ill

Ralph Jentsch, George Grosz, Antwerpen, Uitgeverij Pandora, 2013,

p. 59 ill. en p.282 n° 13

Emmanuel Guigon, George Grosz / Otto Dix, Besançon, Musée du Temps, 2014, p.52-61 ill., p.27

Jan Ceuleers, Raw War, Knokke, galerie Ronny Van de Velde, 2015, pp.48-49 ill.

Andreas Niehaus en anderen, The Art of War, Davidsfonds uitgeverij, Leuven, 2017, p. 172

Artist description:

George Grosz was born in Berlin, Germany, in 1893. After studying art in Dresden and Berlin he began contributing cartoons to German journals such as "Ulk" and "Lustige Blatter".

On the outbreak of the First World War Grosz was conscripted into the German Army. A strong opponent of the war, he was eventually released as unfit for duty. However, the following year, desperate for soldiers, Grosz was called up again. Kept from frontline action, Grosz was used to transport and guard prisoners of war.

After trying to commit suicide in 1917, Grosz was placed in an army hospital. It was decided to execute Grosz but he was saved by the intervention of one of his patrons, Count Kessler. Grosz was now diagnosed as suffering from shell-shock and was discharged from the German Army.

In 1917, Grosz joined with John Heartfield in protesting about the German wartime propaganda campaign against the allies. This included anti-war drawings such as "Fit for Active Service" (1918), in which a well-fed doctor pronounces a skeleton fit for duty.

After the Armistice Grosz was active in left-wing politics and contributed to communist journals published by Malik-Verlag. He also joined with artists such as John Heartfield, Otto Dix, Max Ernst, Kurt Schwitters to form the German Dada group. Grosz's drawings often attacked members of the government and important business leaders. Grosz was taken to court several times but although heavily fined, managed to escape imprisonment. Grosz's collected drawings, "The Face of the Ruling Class" (1921) and "Ecce Homo" (1927), earned him an international reputation as a politically committed artist.

In the late 1920s and early 1930s Grosz directed his attacks against Adolf Hitler and the Nazi Party. In 1932 Grosz was forced to flee from Nazi Germany and after settling in the United States became a naturalized citizen in 1938.

His memoirs, The Autobiography of George Grosz was published in 1955. George Grosz returned to Germany in 1959, saying "My American dream turned out to be a soap bubble". He died shortly after his arrival following a fall down a flight of stairs.